The Modern Sloop

he most common type of small to midsize sailboat is the sloop. The rig is one mast and two sails. The mainsail is a tall, triangular sail mounted to the nast at its leading edge, with the foot of the sail along the boom, which extends aft from the mast. The sail in front, called the jib or sometimes the ead sail, mounts on the forestay between the bow and the masthead, with its trailing corner controlled by the jibsheet.

hese tall triangular sails are called the Bermuda rig, or sometimes the Marconf rig, named for their development more than two centuries ago in ermudan boats. Because of the physics of how force is generated by wind blowing past a sail, tall thin sails generally have more power when the oat is sailing into the wind. This is why most sailboats today have a Bermuda rig.

Schooner with Topsail and Flying Jibs

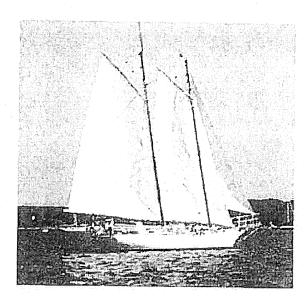

Here's another galf-rigged schooner that is using a topsall and several flying jibs. Tacking or gyoing a complicated sail plan like this takes a lot of crew and expertise!

Schooner

A typical schooner also has two masts (sometimes more), but the masts are positioned more forward in the boat. Unlike in a ketch or yawl, the forward mast is smaller than the aft mast (or sometimes the same size). One or more jibs may fly forward of the foremast.

While some modern schooners may use triangular, Bermuda-like sails on one of both masts, traditional schooners like the one shown here have galf-rigged sails. At the top of the sail is a short spar called the galf, which allows the sail is extend back along a fourth side, gaining size over a triangular sail of the same height.

Gaff-rigged schooners are still seen in many areas and are well loved for their historic appearance and sweeping lines, but they are seldom used anymore for private cruising. The gaff rig is not as efficient as the Bermuda rig, and the rig is more complicated and requires more crew for sall handling.
